Sociology 501T: Critical Race Studies

Course Description

The course will cover a range theoretical perspectives on race and racism that inform how race is structured and how racism is embedded in everyday practices and processes. We will delve into the consequences and underlying agendas of racial power on both a macro and micro level. Critical is how race is interlocked with various identities and capitalist relations and how they have historically pushed marginalized groups to organize for racial justice and articulate understandings of their own identities and futures. The course will further discuss how the politics of colorblindness, liberalism, and allyship serve to maintain racial hierarchies.
